

The program is a great opportunity for researchers interested in U.S. politics and foreign policy, and/or transatlantic relations, offering ten months of fully funded, uninterrupted time for research in Washington, D.C. What makes Johns Hopkins SAIS a unique host institution is that fellows can take advantage of the school's close connections to the D.C. think tank and policy community. This is invaluable not only for policy-oriented researchers, but also for anyone seeking to conduct interviews with U.S. policymakers. My experience as a DAAD Postdoctoral Fellow at SAIS was a turning point in my career. It not only allowed me to finish my book manuscript, but also helped me develop a new research area that I continue to work on today. I continue to profit from the network I built during that time. In my opinion, the program is undoubtedly one of the best post-doctoral fellowships available for people working (broadly) on transatlantic relations.

Dr. Frank A. Stengel, DAAD Postdoctoral Fellow 2019-2020, Lecturer and Research Fellow in International Political Sociology at Kiel University, Germany